SUBJECTS FOR SYMPATHY.—There is a certain class of young men in every community, and ours, we fear, does not form an exception to the rule, who having been tenderly reared in the midst of plenty, and having been educated to no useful employment, are now, from various causes, deprived of the means on which they depended for support in the life of idleness and ease to which they seem to have devoted themselves. With no object in life to stimulate them to exertion, they fritter away their existence in vain pursuits, and are a constant source of anxiety to all whose kindred blood produces a feeling of interest in their welfare. These individuals are so easily to be recognized, that it is unnecessary to describe them. To be known they need only be seen. Their whole life is fruitless of good to themselves or the community in which they reside. They have been brought up with such exalted notions of their own importance, that they think it degrading to be employed in any useful avocation, and they drag out their miserable lives, a burden to themselves and a source of mortification to their friends. Society gains nothing from them while they live, and their death is looked upon by all as a relief.

Truly are such men to be pitied, and particularly to be pitied, because there can be no hope of reformation for them. They cannot be approached and reasoned with on the folly of the course of life which they are following, for their pride, such as it is, would take umbrage at so important an interference. And thus refusing to be influenced by the counsel of the good and the virtuous, they travel with accelerated speed on the road which will surely, at its termination, bring them to poverty, wretchedness and crime.

The small resources on which they now manage to eke out a precarious subsistence, must soon be exhausted, and with the idle and extravagant habits which they have contracted while the means of indulging them have been exhausted, it is melancholy to contemplate the forlorn and ruined condition to which they will be reduced. If they could be brought for a moment to reflect on the inevitable fate which awaits them, they would shrink back in terror and alarm, but we fear that the time for such wholesome exercise is gone forever, and that they will continue in their downward career until death puts a period to their useless lives. —Petersburg Index.

PETER FORCE'S LIBRARY.—The Joint Committee on the Congressional Library at the close of the last session requested the Librarian to make a personal examination of the library of Peter Force, esq., a collection especially rich in what pertains to the history of America; he has complied with their request, and submits a digest of the contents of the library. The New York Historical Society offered Mr. Force $100,000 for his collection, provided the amount could be raised by subscription. It is now proposed that Congress shall purchase it at that price, and thus retain in the national library what it has cost forty-five industrious years to collect. The same sum has likewise been offered by a speculator, but Mr. Force refuses to let so valuable a collection be scattered. The library contains 22,320 volumes, and, counting the pamphlets as volumes, will number 60,000. It is the largest private collection of printed books relating to America ever brought together. It contains complete files of the leading American newspapers from their earliest existence. No collection of pamphlets relating to America, is so full. These pamphlets were printed before the newspaper press, by its variety and the frequency of its issues, had assumed its present importance. There are nearly 40,000 of these historical pamphlets. The collection of maps is full and unique. Among the other valuable atlases is a complete copy of the very scarce "Atlas of the Battles of the American Revolution." The assemblage of maps numbers over 1000. There are forty-eight folio volumes of historical autographs, including numerous letters from Revolutionary generals and statesmen. The whole number of volumes in manuscript is 429. We have no such single collection of treasures relating to the history of America.
